Reaching Beyond

Stockton University, Galloway

“This project was designed to expand access to jazz while strengthening connections with both new and existing audiences. In our region, jazz audiences have been less visible due to the genre’s niche perception and the lack of dense jazz networks often found in major cities. With fewer clubs and regular jazz offerings, audiences have limited opportunities to experience live jazz, making intentional audience development especially important.

Support from Mid Atlantic Arts helped reduce financial risk and allowed us to prioritize access, outreach, and awareness over revenue. The funding supported accessible ticket pricing and expanded marketing efforts that reached beyond our core patron base.

Outreach focused on underserved populations, including African American community members, youth and youth at risk, and aging adults. Through a partnership with the Boys & Girls Club of Atlantic City, several students and their mentor attended the performance at no cost, offering meaningful exposure to live jazz. Audience demographics reflected a strong mix of backgrounds, reinforcing our theater as a welcoming and, inclusive space.

The project also energized existing patrons through outstanding programming. Brent Birckhead’s performance exceeded expectations and attracted new attendees, including students and alumni from HBCUs, due in part to his connection with Howard University.
